Tissue-invading trypomastigotes of Trypanosoma cruzi have been shown to enter and grow in the midgut of the vectoral insect Rhodnius prolixus. Parasites were present at first detection (usually within 2 h) throughout the length of the midgut but were more abundant near the anterior region. In this region the parasite-occupied cells degenerated first and were followed by neighboring cells, resulting in a distinct band of degeneration in the midgut epithelium. Increased levels of either parasite and host tissue were found within this band of degeneration. The parasites entered the cells of the posterior region of the midgut in an anterior-to-posterior direction. Parasite entry was not associated with host cell death or with any structural changes in the host cells, but subsequent differentiation occurred primarily in the cells adjacent to the posterior region. Parasites were consistently found in the region where the midgut epithelium differentiated. The ultrastructural appearance of the parasites within the epithelium and the in vitro sensitivity to different drugs suggested that the trypomastigotes within the epithelium had begun the process of metacyclogenesis, as expected for
